The Apostle of Ireland
by Canon Patrick A. Sheehan

There is something distinctive about the devotion of the Irish to St. Patrick, and especially about their annual celebration of his festival. This is something more than the festival of a saint. It is the festival of a nation, which feels and knows that it is in special favour with God, the grateful joy of those who may fairly regard themselves as the chosen people of Heaven. On other saints days we bless God for the graces He bestowed upon them; on the feast of St. Patrick we bless God, not so much for having manifested His glory in His Saint, as for having glorified himself in His people. It is the feast of the most Catholic people upon earth the people who have done more for God than any other Christian nation the most spiritual people upon earth in whose every-day life are multiplied triumphs of grace over nature, of soul over body the people who have upheld, through unexampled sorrow and temptation, the great victory which Christ gained upon the Cross over the world and the flesh and the devil.

It is no exaggeration to say, that to those who deny the existence of God and of everything supernatural, the history of the Irish people in the past is a puzzle beyond solution, and the history of the Irish people in the past and of everything supernatural, the devil.

All this, to unbelievers, is a wonder of wonders a people walking in an unseen world, holding converse with unseen beings, seeing by faith more than natural worldly gifts, they live by faith and by faith alone. Poor in all the gifts of fortune, they esteem themselves surpassingly rich in all those spiritual gifts which Christians prize. It can be said of us with truth, that no nation has its God so near to it as our God is to us. For our whole strength is from God, our whole happiness is from Him. In our sorrows we go to Him for comfort, in our joys we go to Him in thanksgiving; those false, fictitious pleasures upon which the people of other nations starve their souls, are absolutely unknown to us; we are a chosen nation, a kingly people; and the island which we inhabit is well called “holy,” for every sod of earth you turn in, is the relic of a saint. For the Irish race was then, as it is now, a race of strong passions and ardent affections; and wherever nature is strong and uncorrupted, it naturally seeks for something higher than itself to interpret itself. Its morals were pure, and therefore it easily embraced the morality of Christianity. It was a strong, imaginative race; it sought for a religion higher than nature could discover, and, therefore, when Christianity was preached, its wonderful mysteries captivated the people. They were a people, generous, ardent, self-sacrificing; and, therefore, they eagerly embraced a religion which constantly teaches self-sacrifice, self-denial, and whose central dogma was that God, in human form, had sacrificed Himself for His people. The Irish people had strong affection and reverence for their poor, and they saw that Christianity taught that the poor were its Founder’s Divine legacy, and that kindness to them was to be the measure of our fitness for Heaven.

And God, looking upon this people with eyes of love, chose as their Apostle from His whole Church a man according to His own heart. By nature, by grace, by his training under the hands of Providence, St. Patrick was fitted for the great work of the apostolate to which he was called. Whatever disputes may rage about his nationality, there cannot be the slightest doubt that he was a man of singular sanctity, and endowed with every natural and supernatural gift that could qualify him for his mission. As a child, he was remarkable for his piety and holiness; and God tried him in his youth as He tries all His saints, by bitter adversity; and when he was tried and not found wanting, God placed him under the care of three of the greatest saints of the Church, St. Martin of Tours, St. Germanus, and St. Vincent of Lerins. From St. Martin, his uncle, he drew that zeal for the salvation of souls for which he was so remarkable; from St. Germanus, he learned the great science of the saints and became thoroughly acquainted with the magnificent theology of the Catholic Church and from St. Vincent, he learned that deep love for God, which influenced all his actions during life, was the source of his zeal, and the reason of his success. Looking back all these years to those wild and barbarous times, there is something very touching in the sight of that young saint, exiled from home, a slave engaged in the most servile occupation, in a strange land, and amongst a wild people, and finding his only consolation in worshipping the great unseen Father who was so tenderly watching over him, and preparing him for the most glorious mission that apostle ever received. The young swineherd in the bleak mountains of Donegal, with no companions but the beasts he tended, knelt one hundred times by day and one hundred times by night, to worship God. All his strength came from prayer, and from union with the cross of his Divine Master.

He bore that captivity for six long years, his great heart all the time yearning towards the strong, passionate people that lived around him, who, in their own rude way, were worshipping the unseen God in groves of oak, and offering sacrifices of human beings towards the creations of their own imaginations. St. Patrick could not approach them, he could not speak to them; he wept and prayed for them; but God's time had not come, and the Saint, with great sorrow in his heart, bade farewell to the Irish shores and left the people whom he loved in darkness and the shadow of death. But see how wonderfully God works! The Saint thought that he was abandoning his people for ever. The Eternal Father was only removing him for a moment to unite them again on firmer and more lasting bonds of spiritual affection. He removed St. Patrick to prepare him by study and prayer – and by the Sacrament of Holy Orders and by the blessing of the Supreme Pontiff for his exalted mission.

And when the time was come, in sleep, in a vision, he received from God his mission. And he rose up and obeyed, and on the same shores that he had sanctified by his prayers before, he landed again – no longer a slave, but a prince and prelate of God's Church – no longer clad in sheep-skin, but in the sacred vestments of a Bishop, no longer bearing a shepherd's staff, but the crozier, the emblem of pastoral love and fatherly care and affection – no longer alone, but surrounded by priests and monks and levites – the precursor of that glorious Irish hierarchy that has evangellised the world, and carried to all nations the name and doctrine of Jesus Christ. And then occurred that wonderful and sudden resurrection of a whole people from darkness to light, from the black and terrible mysteries of druidism to the Christian religion, with its doctrines of love and mercy and pity. It was not that St. Patrick made a convert here and a convert there, but the whole nation, the nation that had cried to him in his dreams rose up at his bidding, and casting aside the traditions of two thousand years, embraced the doctrines that St. Patrick preached to them, because the very instincts of the people told them that these doctrines were true. And it was not the poor alone that St. Patrick converted; but the rich, the educated, the powerful, the druid priest, and the bard that was omnipotent, all, as if they had been expecting for years the summons of Christ's Apostle, cast aside their power and their wealth, and made themselves disciples of Patrick and slaves of Christ. The old fierceness of the people vanished before the mild teachings of Christianity. The old men, warriors and clansmen, went down into their graves without a wish for revenge; and the young - the pure, young Irish, fascinated by the glories of Christianity, came in thousands to the feet of Patrick, and gave themselves body and soul to the service of Jesus Christ, their Master.

Convents and monasteries covered the land, and schools sprang up by their sides, and the schools developed into colleges, and the colleges grew into universities, and when learning was banished from Europe, it found a home in the West, and Europe, in its despair, looked to Ireland, as to a nation of Apostles, who were to evangelise and educate it.

Meanwhile, the grand old Saint had gone to his reward. His life was laborious, but quiet, travelling from end to end of the island, preaching, catechising, healing the sick, consecrating bishops, and ordaining priests, receiving the vows of countless Irish virgins and clothing them with the consecrated veils, symbols of that immaculate purity which at all times has characterised the daughters of St. Bridget. And when the time of his reward had come, he received the Body of Christ from the hands of one of his Bishops, and passed into Heaven, bearing as his offering to God, and as the result of his life's labours, a whole nation, a nation of Saints and doctors, whose fidelity to God is as certain as that of the angels, who have been confirmed by God in their glory.

An old chronicle sums up his virtues and sanctity in this way: “A just man, indeed, was this man; with purity of nature, like the patriarchs; a true pilgrim, like Abraham; gentle and forgiving of heart, like Moses; a praiseworthy psalmist, like David; an emulator of wisdom, like Solomon; a chosen vessel for proclaiming truth, like the Apostle Paul; a man full of grace and the knowledge of the Holy Ghost, like the beloved John; a fair flower garden to children of grace; a flaming fire; a lion in strength and power; a dove in gentleness and humility; a serpent in wisdom to do good; gentle, humble, merciful, towards sons of life; dark, ungentle towards sons of death; a servant of labour and service for Christ; a king in dignity and might, for binding and loosening, for liberating and convicting, for killing and giving life.” Such was the Apostle of Ireland, the glorious St. Patrick.

Patrick Augustine Sheehan (17 March 1852 – 5 October 1913) was an Irish Catholic priest, author and political activist. He was known as Canon Sheehan after his 1903 appointment as a canon of the diocese of Cloyne. He was born on St. Patrick's Day 1852 in Mallow to Patrick and Joanna Sheehan and the third of 5 children. When he was 13 years old he lost both his parents within 7 months. He and his siblings became the ward of the Parish Priest of Mallow, Dr. John McCarthy who later became Bishop of Cloyne. Canon Sheehan studied in Maynooth College and his first parish was Exeter in Plymouth. He later returned to Cork where he was priest in the parish of Cobh/Queenstown before being transferred to Doneraile. Apart from his priestly duties, he was a prolific writer and wrote beautifully about Irish life and faith at the turn of the century. His books were very popular and he was known and loved by many as Canon Sheehan of Doneraile. He also had a love of gaelic sports. Canon Sheehan had great devotion to Our Lady and Saint Patrick. Interestingly, in this article, he places St. Patrick's 6 years of captivity in County Donegal, not on Slemish in County Antrim. Canon Sheehan died on Rosary Sunday 1913.
